Raccoons can be found in North and Central America, Europe, and Japan. They prefer to find food during night time hours since they have excellent night vision. Many people think raccoons are cute, and want to keep them as pets. They think raccoons are “clean eaters” because raccoons usually wash food before eating. However, studies show that raccoons do not “wash” their food. They wet their food in order to gather more information from it. Raccoons get information mainly by their sense of touch. Wetting their paws help them become more sensitive to the things they touch.

Raccoons are also well-known for stealing food. They have five toes like humans, so they can easily open locked doors and trash cans to get food. They eat almost everything, such as insects, vegetables, or even dead animals. They are also very smart, even smarter than dogs and cats. However, they carry serious diseases that may do harm to human health. Therefore, it is not a good idea to keep raccoons as pets.
