If selfies are indeed a cultural phenomenon, isn't it a museum's duty to engage with them in the same way they engage with other aspects of culture? It is inevitable that people will engage with art and history on a personal level. For some, this is simply a matter of gazing at and thinking about a work, but for others taking a selfie is a way to integrate an otherwise obscure exhibit into their daily life.

Allowing selfies is also healthy for business. For many, the lure of a good selfie backdrop is what gets them over the museum's threshold. This increases donations to the museum, allowing a venue to showcase more exhibits and better preserve the exhibits already in their possession.

It is also worth bearing in mind that, in a world now dominated by the cult of the influencer, having the endorsement or influential selfie-takers can often drive footfall more effectively than a costly PR campaign. Museums might want people to come in and view their artifacts, but if people use technology to experience collections in a more interactive way, what's the harm?

Whether a particular museum decides to allow or forbid selfies will inevitably be tied to what they believe their institution's role is: to preserve the treasures of the past, reflect the values of the present, or seek to blend the two.
